Production: Heat Map

Heat map showing production levels across different regions and time periods. The map uses a color scale from green (low production) to red (high production) to indicate the intensity of production activity.

Production levels are generally higher in the Southeast Asian region, particularly in the southern part of the map, indicating a strong manufacturing base.

The map also shows significant production activity in the central and northern parts of the region, suggesting a diverse industrial landscape across the area.

Overall, the heat map highlights the high concentration of production in the Southeast Asian region, which is a key indicator of the area's economic strength and industrial capacity.

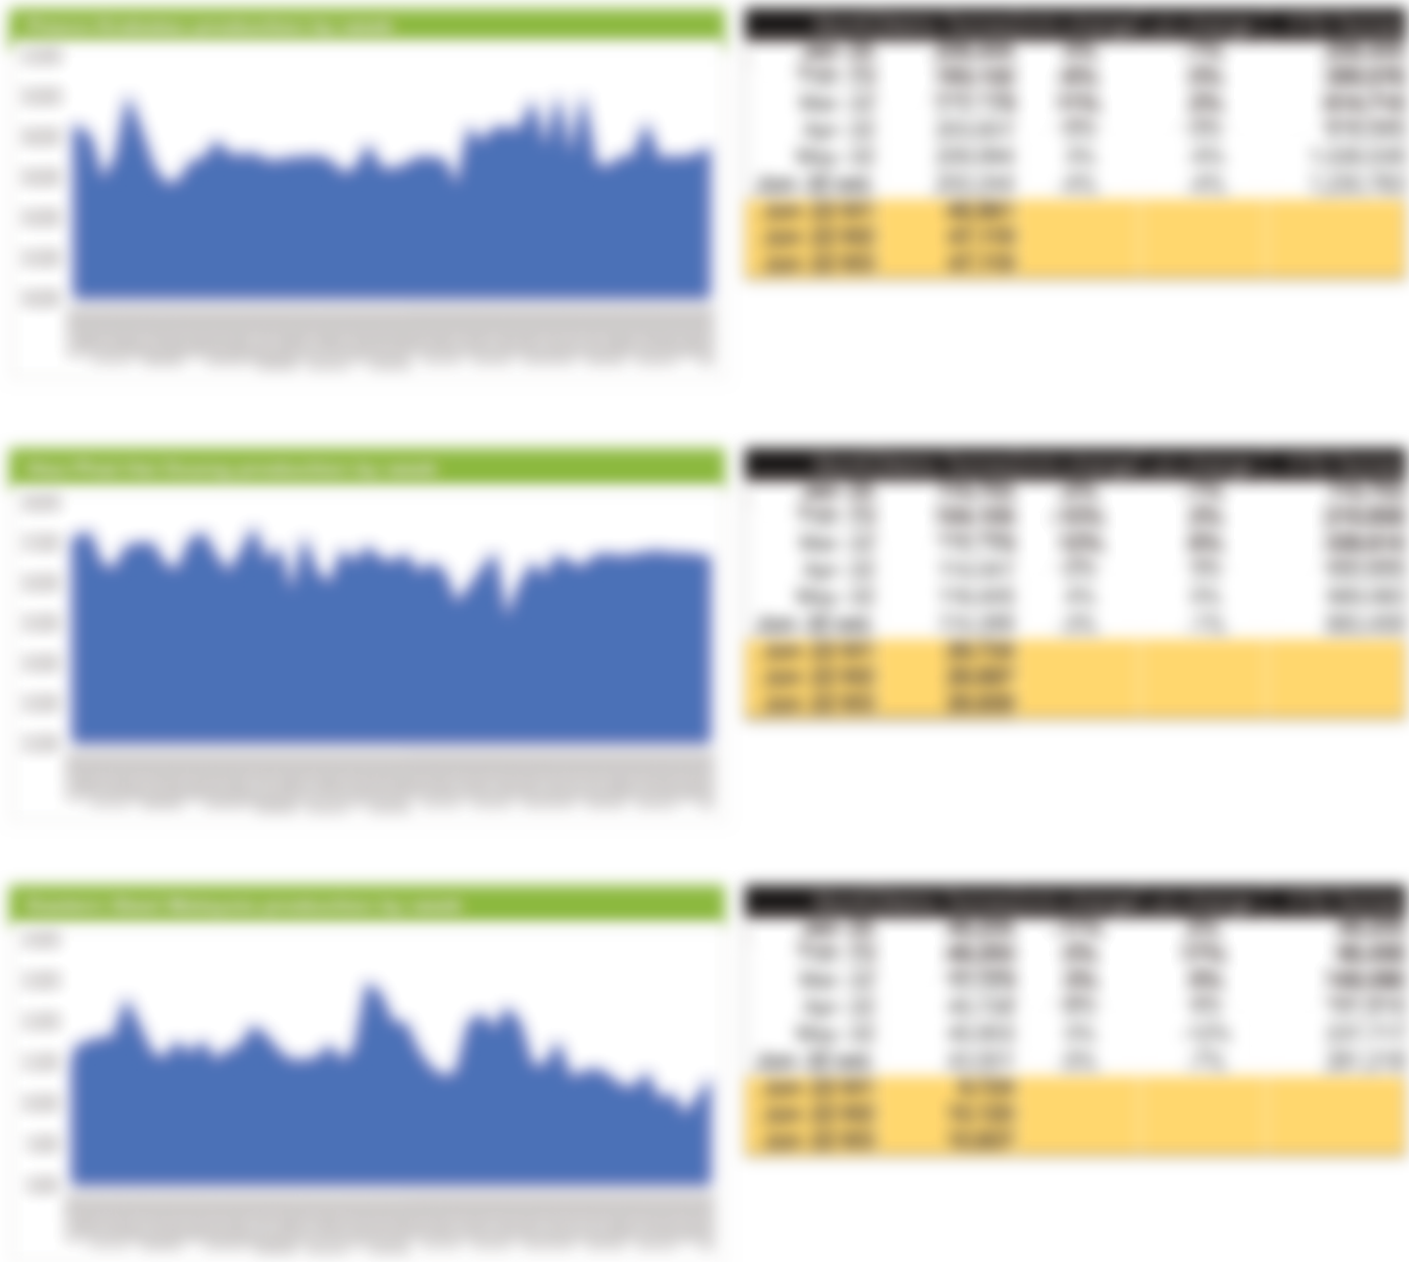

The data presented in the heat map is derived from reliable sources and provides a clear visual representation of the production trends across the South East Asia region.
